Catchphrase: you wouldn't say this to your family and friends (or child), so why would you say it to yourself?

I will attempt to make a "game" by coding this website.

The viewer would be presented with an image of someone labelled as their friend or a random child (depending on which one i pick) and are presented two options on what to say to the child/friend. One is a compliment that isn't body focused and one that is slightly back handed or implies pressure to keep up that appearance or to change something.

However, when they go to click for the compliment it will say an insult instead and the face of the person will become sad.
This will happen two more times.
Next time it will show just their character, but this time both options are an insults. There wil be an option that also says go home. If they click the other two insults it will have the icon be sad until eventually they click go home.
Then it will be their character sad in the mirror, and a phrase… "you wouldnt say this to your family and friends/ a child, so why would you say it to yourself?"

And also highlight the frustration felt with seemingly no choice because its unjust for those receiving those insults. And should be unjust for you saying it to yourself because you, unlike this character, have a choice in what to say and comment on, so make that choice count.

